Standard Rules For
Rescue from Drowning.

To get the water out, lay the person face down with a cask, billet of wood, or any large object under the stomach; or clasp your hands under the belly and lift him.

Tickle the throat with a straw or feather, then use artificial respiration.

Take the clothing off the upper part of the body from the waist up; place him on his back; roll up the clothing and place under his head. Pull the tongue out of the throat by means of a string or handkerchief, and keep it out by tying, if you can.

Kneel at his head; grasp his arms below the elbow; draw them upward and to the sides of his head to expand the chest out; bring them down along the sides and front of the chest and press hard on the chest to drive the air out.

Go through this entire operation 15 times a minute, and for an hour, if necessary, applying in the meantime ammonia or smelling salts to the nostrils.

When breathing begins, wrap in warm blankets; rub the whole body briskly toward the heart. Give slightly of stimulants and warm drinks.
